
The Stars Sing

Without fail the dream finds you: rising like the tide into other, mundane fantasies, a great blackness seeps. As the tide churns and roils silently, all other thoughts are washed away, dwindling to a pinprick of perception before winking out. When fully permeated by the dream you hang in a darkness so absolute – so crushingly still that any inkling of fear is crushed from you – leaving only awe and a suffusing silence. Gradually you become aware of an infinite number of sombre lights surrounding you – a starscape richer and denser than any you have seen before. But this is not a creeping darkness that hides the unknown – it is a panorama of emptiness greater than your sleeping mind can even begin to process.

After an aeon frozen amidst this canvas the stillness is interrupted by faint, discordant sounds, ethereal and growing closer. The sounds solidify and harmonise as you listen: interweaving into a discernible melody little by little until, seemingly all at once the music is heard. Three stars build in intensity as the music takes shape: arranged as a triangle, one point is larger, yet no more bright, than the other two. They shimmer in time with the music, their light shimmering like a perfect white flame.

Each time you hear this music a strange, formless longing kindles within you – a need for something you cannot define that is with you even when you wake, never waning.

You have, either by yourself or with the aid of those talented in such things, put the music to paper – but despite your efforts you feel that this is just one part of a greater whole. A greater whole that begs to be heard...
