Dear Silas

Your quest is coming to an end and it is time for you to present your list of accomplishments to my lord the Iron Duke, so that he may deem your worthiness of a reward.

Your sentinel gate will open at quarter past 1 on Saturday afternoon to the Grove of the Thousand, Axmure, Semmerholm. My lord Barien will be waiting there to meet you. You may bring a small number of guests to witness your ceremony, if you so wish.

Good luck, questor. We look forward to meeting you again.

We are kindred spirits who have sought the test of the Lord of the Crossroads.

I have a challenge for you.

We should set terms.

Bring yourself, and 5 others if you must, to the Malmrholt in Fareskov, Skallahn. 1:45 on Saturday of your upcoming festival.

You will be in no danger. You have my word, on my honour, that we are here just to talk.

We will meet soon.

Dear Ahshen,

I hope this letter finds you well. I am Alma, one of the civil servants working for you at the House. I writing to you to let you know about an odd event that has happened in the months since the last summit – just after the summit we received word from some locals that a group of around 20 Asaveans had appeared on one of the southerly islands of Madrugá. They had some Imperial coin and were clearly slaves of some sort, but unfortunately didn't speak a word of Imperial and so communication was a bit fraught. Nevertheless, they seemed quite cooperative and eager to get out of their situation, so once a translator and some more appropriate clothes were found they were brought here to the House of Guerra to acclimatise.

The former Asaveans are all in good health and were well fed before coming here, but have obviously been treated poorly. They are to a person illiterate sadly, though that is something we are working quickly to rectify. They asked me to pass on some details to you to share with those who go to Anvil;

Firstly, they thank the people of the Brass Coast and those who bargained for their freedom and gave them coin. They are understandably relieved to be unexpectedly freed; some are eager to start the process of becoming Imperial citizens, others are still a bit shocked at their situation. Nobody is pining for the Archipelago, though.

They were not able to explain at the time due to language issues, but they wanted to give more details of how they ended up in Madrugá. They were not privy to all the details of course, but their ship, the Squalo, had sailed from Asavea with a number of others and had been sending out a small boat to scout the coast at night for a number of days before the incident where the corsairs freed them. One of them pointed out that only second-rate and small ships are operated by slaves – the big warships are staffed by professional sailors, the Asaveans wouldn't trust slaves with such an important job.

The freed folk aren't sure exactly what they were doing in Madrugá, but they heard the words "Gar du Sel" and "Atalaya" many times, and were looking for isolated places where they might be people, presumably so they could return in the future for some purpose. Someone at the hostel asked if there were other ships – they knew there was at least one more but couldn't say beyond that. They were told very little, as it was clear the whole mission was attempting to be as stealthy as possible, and there was a high risk of capture.

We will continue our work to make sure these folk are taken care of and can get to wherever it is they decide to end up going. In the meantime, I hope your business at the upcoming summit goes well.

Yours,

Alma i Duran i Guerra (and June, Patrice, Lidia, Egisto, Luna, Pippo, Axel, Pascale, Nina, Flore, Berni, Gioia, Carmen, Neizan, Denis, Saul, Teo, Maruta, Elide & Saverio)
