

I'm writing to you on behalf of Polygenus – apologies if any of this doesn't make sense. As you'll remember, he is easily distracted and I don't fully understand what he is trying to tell you. He assures me it makes sense.

As you hallowed the jewels he passed to you last summit, you will now be beginning to feel the curse of the stars which you chose awakening. The curse itself is not a transformation, but it's the beginning of one.

You may not notice anything different at first, but the constellation is working through you now, your every fibre.

If you bear this curse for four seasons, the Door will offer you a transformation.

You may find your current choice unfitting. The curse you are experiencing indicates something of the transformation which will work itself in you. If this transformation is not one you desire, then hallowing your jewels to another virtue will change the curse once more.

The stars move slowly, however, and after hallowing you must wait a season for the curse to work and change itself into a new form.

The form you give the curse in its final, fourth season, will be the transformation the Door offers you.

You accepted these jewels, so Polygenus assures me you don't need to be told of the freedom, the joy of these transformations. And of the terror and horror of them.

I just want to thank you again for helping him to fulfil this hunger the Door seems to be consuming him with. I hope to have my spiremate back soon.

If there's anything we can do to support you through this process, we both want to help.

Yours,

Callisto of the Emerald Meridian

And

Polygenus of the Emerald Meridian