

Irina,

When last we spoke, we said we had nothing more to say to each other.

Rossignol is still deeply hurt by Simargl's rudeness and does not wish to see him. However I have managed to persuade him that perhaps lashing out in sadness is not perhaps the best approach.

I wondered, would you want to act as counsel to them both? If Simargl was prepared to ask for a personal favour, something that mattered to them alone, not something of Imperial concerns, then that might be a point to start discussions from.

Would you be prepared to at least ask? Do you have understanding of the Loquacious One enough to know that it could not be an open favour, just word given – the realm is mysterious, but the Speaker in Dreams will think badly of one of his Heralds who allows himself to be trapped. Could you coax Simargl into thinking of things he needs that would be in our scope to offer?

If you could, or would, or even just wish to join us in a Night Chamber and tell Rossignol that he really had best leave Simargl alone, you are welcome, we will also be discussing some other matters of past and present love. The portal will open for you and Kahendrin and Liissa, two others whose opinions we also value, at half past six on the Saturday evening of the Solstice if you should wish to attend.

You should be able to find me in Lumi's Teahouse early on the Friday evening of the Solstice if you would like to talk further. Oh! And I hope you enjoyed the dreams.

Yours
