

For Tabor

Greetings, and Virtues be with you.

I write today to inform you of my work to explain the Way of Virtue correctly to my peers, my creator and other creatures of the Day Realm. I fear that thus far my efforts have met with little in the way of concrete success. The servants of Roshanve say my evidence is insufficient for my claims - indeed, that no evidence can be sufficient, and therefore my evidence-based argument for the Way is unconvincing compared to their approach (which is based on unfalsifiables, and therefore to my reason intrinsically unwise). The servants of Sinokenon and Zakalve say that my claims imply an inherent rationality on the part of mortals that does not jibe with their experiences. The servants of Leviathan say that they have heard my arguments before, before even I have completed them. And my creator declares that the aura of Courage I stood is likely to have twisted my mind such that my conclusions are not valid. My next steps are thus towards assessing, adapting, adjusting strategy, and continuing - I am not defeated!

I had been planning to come to the Symposium at Anvil, but the calls of duty mean I cannot - there is a conference in Phaleron on communication that I am sent to attend, and I shall be using the Way as a worked example. I would dearly like to know what goes on at the Symposium, though: could you send a report to Phaleron, I think I and others of the Day Realm could gain greater understanding of the Way, and it would aid my efforts to convince them of its importance.

Yours in Courage,
